The St. Johns Herald says that the people are becoming weary of the daily killing of the birds. They will kill a steer, strip the hide from one half the carcass, out all the meat from the bones on the sides, turn the animal over so that the side unskinned will be uppermost and have the appearance of having been unskinned. Any one finding the carcass, coming across the carcass, would naturally think the animal had died a natural death, but if they were to take the trouble to investigate a little more closely, would find that half the hide, as may be the case with a large sheepman in New Mexico, said that he always killed his beef in the brush; that if any one should ride up on him while he was engaged in the job, that he would try to kill the man.
